Project Zagreb Transition Condition Strategy

Practicing in conditions of continuous instability, architects and planners in 20th century Zagreb developed new strategies of urbanism and architecture for creatively engaging the transitional, conditional, mutable, and open-ended -- for absorbing, accommodating, anticipating and instrumentalizing the condition of irresolution.

Planning and Design. Zagreb is the perfect site for examining the generative dynamic of transition: currently preparing for Croatia's entry into the European Union and negotiating the rocky shoals of the "transition economy," but also a city in which political and economic transition has been the status quo for the last century and a half.

The methods employed in Project Zagreb to excavate the generative dynamic of transition responded to the need to develop techniques for representing and analyzing conditions that are multiple and unstable. In the exhibition, therefore, transition—as condition, strategy, and practice—is examined through assembly, mapping, diagramming, layering, and other techniques that make it possible to visualize synchronous and nonsynchronous transformations occurring at different rates in different ...
